Hi Jason,

My apologies for the belated reply, your email somehow found it's way into my Junk folder. I totally understand where you're coming from, perhaps a little bit irrational or overly ambitious, but I'm glad I applied as it meant getting some quality advise from yourself!

As random as it may seem, reading your email today has given me an uplift and pushed me towards what I really want. Let me explain.. as much as I dislike my job - getting paid a pretty decent salary, being independent, owning my own car and being able to afford paying car insurance, renting my own place to live.. well it's a pretty good feeling for a 23 year-old beginning the intimidating life of an adult, 2 years fresh out of college. So to pursue a different career/education/experience, is a bit of a daunting thought. Nevertheless, yesterday I started looking up night time courses which could point me in the right direction, and I came across exactly what I was looking for! (<http://www.nightcourses.com/course/motor-car-maintenance-1023706.html>) Now, it may not be a mechanical engineering diploma, but its a 10 week course which offers the needed kickstart. But the idea of jumping into something new had me scared and doubting myself. And reading your email today had sparked something in me and it all clicked, and what I was fearing suddenly didn't seem so daunting anymore. As they say, do something you love and you'll never work a day in your life. So thanks to you, the inner bitch in me quietened down and today I've applied for the following course. I also did further research and found the perfect course which actually does offer an engineering diploma, it's a 3 years, part time on Monday & Thursday evenings, and half day on Saturday's. Which still allows me to keep my full time job - <http://www.dit.ie/studyatdit/part-time/programmescourses/allcourses/automotivetechologydiagnosticsdt714.html#> . I will be applying for this course during the next open application window.

Thank you for taking a moment out of your daily schedule to writie to me. Who would have thought a simple email can have so much influence on someone? And thank you for the advise - as you see, I have taken and used it! 3-4 years down the line, when I will be receiving my diploma you will be hearing from me again, I will be back with another job application! And if you ever pass through Ireland do drop an email, I'll buy you that pint!

Best wishes,
Andrew
